

eating disorders, anorexia nervosa, discourse analysis, anorexia and bulimia, Gremillion, disordered eating, slenderness, discourses, Foucauldian discourse analysis, relationship, weight gain, Medical Model, Malson, Discursive Psychology, Journal of Community and Applied Social Psychology, Journal of Health Psychology, International Journal of Eating Disorders, subjective experience, National Institute for Clinical Excellence, behaviours, Deci & Ryan, psychosocial issues, Academic Psychiatry, Clinical Psychology Review, weight control, Treatment Experiences, References American Psychiatric Association, quantitative research methods, quantitative methods, Bulimia Nervosa, Understanding, Treatment of Eating Disorders, eating disorder, body weight, research methods, treatment experience, language construction, experience, patriarchal society, anorexic body, Journal of Abnormal Psychology, Harvard University Press, Journal of Consulting and Clinical Psychology, self-determination theory, self-control, mental disorders, Mental health practitioners, Clinical Psychology, autonomy, disorders, Malson & Ryan, social construction, family communication, healthy eating, Psychological Bulletin

Beyond the Medical Model: Can Discourse Analysis Provide Further Understanding of the Treatment of Eating Disorders