

Mexico, government, United States, banking system, federal government, institutions, Sylla, Economic Growth, Stanford University, Stephen Haber, Bodenhorn, state governments, economic development, Ross Levine, the United States, political institutions, Political Economy, James Robinson, democratic institutions, Pennsylvania, bankers, the state, the government, Maurer, Development, Mexico City, banking systems, Cambridge University Press, Bank of the United States, Simon Johnson, American History, National Bureau of Economic Research, Industrial Development, American Economic Review, Northern Illinois University Press, Journal of Financial Economics 58, Economic History, Journal of Economic History, Oxford University Press, Quarterly Journal of Economics, public finance, University of Chicago Press, Bank of North America, free bank, chartered banks, federal bonds, central government, barriers to entry, free banking, Kenneth Sokoloff, Richard Sylla, private banks, bank charter, Pennsylvania State Legislature, Banamex, Armando Razo, state governors, state legislatures, commercial bank, federal system of government, state government, bank director

Political institutions, banks, and economic growth: Evidence from the United States and Mexico